We've read about trophy buildings and specialty buildings, but only recently has anyone written about the success of "incubator buildings" in today's markets. Incubator buildings that house small companies, often start-up firms, that lease, on average, under 2,000 square feet and often less than 500 square feet. In addition to the economic factors encouraging the growth of small companies, incubator spaces are popular because they add flexibility to new business. As more businesses get started, they don't want to lock themselves into long-term leases.
